There is a village twenty kilometers from the nearest town. There are about 500 people belonging to the high caste. There is another small village, five kms from this village. The people of the second village belong to a lower caste. There is a tank common to both the villages. The high caste people take water from this tank, but the lower caste people are not allowed to touch the water in the tank. If they want water, they must ask a high caste person to take water from the tank and pour it into their pots. They must not touch the water. The people of both the villages follow this 'rule'.

A sixteen-year-old girl from the lower caste village is studying in the 12th standard in a school at the town. After writing the examination she returns to her village. One day she goes to the tank to get water. At the time she arrives at the tank, there is nobody near the well, so she takes water from the tank. As she is beginning to return to her village, a man from the higher caste appears suddenly. He scolds the girl and breaks her pot. She starts crying, returns home and informs her people.
