Read the following passage and answer the questions given after it.

Australia's Great Barrier Reef is going through its third "bleaching" event in five years. Record-setting ocean temperatures are threatening the health of this important underwater environment.

The Great Barrier Reef in the Pacific Ocean is the largest coral reef in the world. It runs for over 1,400 miles (2,300 kilometers) off the northeast coast of Australia. The reef is home to thousands of different forms of underwater life. As the temperature of the world's oceans has increased in recent years, corals around the world have begun to die off. This is often called "coral bleaching" because sometimes the dying corals turn white.

The coral shapes we are used to seeing are built over a very long time by millions and millions of tiny coral animals. The large coral structures provide conditions that attract and support many other sea creatures. So when corals die off, it's not just about the corals. It's also about the collection of creatures that live in and around them. The richness of all these different kinds of animals in the same place is very important to the health of oceans.

Most corals only grow in warm oceans. But when the oceans become too warm, the corals become stressed and have trouble adjusting to the temperatures. Though corals that have suffered bleaching can recover, if the damage is too serious, they will die.

This February was the hottest month ever for the waters around the Great Barrier Reef. In some areas, ocean temperatures were as much as 5° Fahrenheit (2.8° Celsius) higher than the average.

Similar bleaching events happened in 2016 and 2017, leaving large areas of the reef dead or nearly dead. Scientists worry that this third bleaching event in the last five years could make it much harder for some of the corals to bounce back.

The increased sea temperatures are part of a larger pattern in Australia, driven by global heating. Over the last year, the country has suffered from a severe drought and struggled to keep control during its worst bushfire season ever.

The Great Barrier Reef is also very important to Australia for other reasons. The tourists who visit the country every year to dive or fish on the Great Barrier Reef bring lots of money into the country and provide many jobs for the people who live there.

In the seaside area of Chennai there are, instead, some of the government offices, University buildings, colleges, and hostels. The students who study in these colleges are particularly lucky. From their windows they can look at the great stretch of the blue sea, and even in the hottest season they are cooled by refreshing sea breezes.

There are other attractions on the Marina: two fine statues by well-known sculptors. The first shows a group of workmen who are moving an immense rock; this represents the glory of hard work. Beside the sea in the city of Chennai there is a magnificent road, about nine kilometres long, called the Marina. In most seaside towns there are hotels, lodging-houses, shops and restaurants, crowds of tourists and countless vehicles along the sea front. In the seaside area of Chennai there are, instead, some of the government offices, University buildings, colleges, and hostels. The students who study in these colleges are particularly lucky. From their windows they can look at the great stretch of the blue sea, and even in the hottest season they are cooled by refreshing sea breezes.

There are other attractions on the Marina: two fine statues by well-known sculptors. The first shows a group of workmen who are moving an immense rock; this represents the glory of hard work. The other is a statue of the Father of our Nation, Mahatma Gandhi. Every day it is visited by crowds of people. You must have seen the statues, or get someone to take you there.
